Ammu and the monsoon umbrella

Ammu had a yellow umbrella that was a little too big. On the first heavy rain of the year she walked to the corner shop for milk, and the umbrella kept tipping back because the wind came down the lane.

"Hold it with two hands," said the shopkeeper, who was a kind man with a green awning. Ammu did, and the rain drummed like fingers on the cloth. She paid for the milk, said thank you, and walked home without a wet copybook.

At the door her mother said, "The umbrella is bigger than you, but you brought it back the right way up." Ammu smiled, and they made tea, and they watched the lane fill with brown water that later went away.

A paid booklet is written to the age you name, with a simple moral or none, and can include simple illustrations. This sample is four short paragraphs to show voice, not a full printed book.
